[For the Dispatch.] Old Blandford Church and Cemetery—Peterson Volunteers; Monument to their Memory—Jack Hill.

Every time I ride or walk to Petersburg I have to pass by old Blandford Church. It was built in the year 1735—more than one hundred and fifty years ago. Its walls are in a good state of preservation at the present time; a strong, substantial roof has been recently put upon them, but there is no disposition among the people of Petersburg to repair the inside of the church. It is thought best to let it remain as it is—a complete ruin, overgrown with ivy. It has neither doors nor windows, nor any door to it, except the ground on which it was built. Pulpit, gallery, and communion-table have long since disappeared. Standing in the midst of a graveyard, its mouldering walls speak with touching eloquence of the rapid flight of time, and admonish all the living of the transitory nature of earthly greatness and grandeur.

It has been surrounded with graves, no doubt, since it was first built, but it is now a complete ruin. The monument to the memory of the Petersburg volunteers, which is certainly an ornament to the city of Petersburg, so beautiful are some of the monuments it contains and with so much taste are its smooth walls and its broad avenues arranged. That part of the cemetery which is near the church is too decayed to be worth visiting.
